The map is very good, although I would prefer that it be upside down to show what I see in my reflector. I have the other mirror image version for my refractor. The map is small so I can't complain that there are numbers instead of feature names. For the names superimposed on the objects I go to the larger maps by Sky and Telescope.

Star mapping is nearly as old as stargazing itself, but celestial maps are trendier than ever before. By definition, a celestial map is a key to the stars traditionally used to help astronomers see constellations and galaxies. But these days it's common to find vintage maps or artist replicas framed as home decor.

Maps are laminated onto foam core then secured into the frame. The engineered molding is made from recycled wood in either a black or walnut-finish. Most map moldings are 2" x 3/4" but maps 24" x 36" and under use a 1.25" wide molding. You can use map pins, stickers, or wet-erase markers on all our framed maps.

This chart is from a Russian celestial atlas published in 1829. I became aware of this unusual atlas while searching for new acquisitions for the collections of Geography and Map Division. This led me to learn more about it. The atlas is significant because it was the first published Russian celestial atlas. It is also rare.
