The Roman Cavalry

Roman Cavalry The Romans initially depended upon their allies to provide cavalry and until the late republican period these were usually based on tribal groupings. During the early empire these became regularised into units known as Ala. They were still manned usually by non-citizens and were well trained (despite what some wargamers may think).

Roman Cavalry

The cavalry in the early Roman Republic remained the preserve of the wealthy landed class known as the equites —men who could afford the expense of maintaining a horse in addition to arms and armor heavier than those of the common legions.
